A morning at the field station

At 08:30, a small team follows the path from the observation hut to the dunes. The sea is calm and the light is warm. A notebook, a map and a water bottle are ready for the short walk.

At the marsh, the team records eight fictional observations. The shore adds twelve and the dunes add six. Together the three habitats contribute twenty-six observations. These numbers are sample data, not real research.

Before leaving, the team checks the supply list, saves a photograph and writes a short summary. The goal is simple: collect a useful piece, check it carefully, and keep it in a format that works for the next task.
